About Cystinosis

Cystinosis is a rare, inherited, metabolic disease that is characterized by the abnormal accumulation of the amino acid cystine in each of the body’s cells. Build-up of cystine in the cells eventually destroys all major organs of the body including the kidneys, liver, eyes, muscles, bone marrow, thyroid and brain.

Medication is available to control some of the symptoms of this terrible disease, but cystinosis remains incurable.

Cystinosis affects approximately 500 people, mostly children, in North America and fewer than 2,000 worldwide. It is one of the 7,000 rare or “orphan” diseases in the United States that collectively impacts approximately 30 million Americans.

Federal funding for research on cystinosis and other rare diseases is virtually non-existent and most pharmaceutical companies remain uninterested because financial rewards are too small. Yet, while there is only a small number of patients who suffer from any given “orphan” disease, knowledge gained by studying one disease often leads to advancements in other rare diseases and more prevalent and well-known disorders.

The Cystinosis Research Foundation was established in 2003 with the sole purpose of raising funds to find better treatments and ultimately a cure for cystinosis.

Today, CRF is the largest provider of grants for cystinosis research in the world, funding more than 131 studies in 12 countries. CRF has raised $29.3 million, which it has granted or committed to cystinosis research studies around the world. CRF’s efforts have changed the course of cystinosis research and given new energy to its investigators and scientists. CRF’s commitment to research has given hope and promise to the global community of cystinosis patients and their families.
